to motorists in need. Between 1.5 and 2 million hours are monitored each year (excluding those hours monitored by nonresponding REACT members). Between 55,000 and 60,000 accidents, road obstructions, and major traffic jams are reported each year. In addition, REACT volunteers handle hundreds of thousands of minor incidents, ranging from requests for road information to requests for help for stalled vehicles. However, REACT monitoring sites reflect the geographic distribution of the population. One study found that 74 percent of base station coverage occurs in 2 percent of the geographic area of the United States. Urban areas are well covered, but rural coverage is sparse, and it is on rural roads where a majority of fatal accidents occur (3).

Many state police departments, in addition to the volunteers, monitor channel 9. In 1977, 48 state police agencies monitored emergency broadcasts, but that number has since fallen (interview with Robert Tall, Associated Public Safety Communications Officers, March 23, 1984). Part of the reason for the decline is the cutback in federal funds for the National Emergency Aid Radio (NEAR) program. This program was sponsored by the U.S. Department of Transportation and was designed to promote coordination of voluntary efforts with those of public safety agencies.

Finally, CB emergency transmissions can be picked up by other mobile users and the information relayed to appropriate authorities. As a result, it is difficult to measure precisely the coverage of CB transmissions. A large number of calls are received by volunteers, but
